How Much Is Enough?

What would satisfy the need — and why do I still want more?

READING

Epictetus, Enchiridion 15; Seneca, Letters 23.1–8. Epictetus's banquet image trains moderation in receiving and waiting for externals. Seneca directs joy toward sound purpose and conduct. We examine dependence on more and what we are learning to value.

BEFORE THE MEETING

Announce on your Substack. Invite members to notice an expanding "enough": possessions, praise, convenience, or certainty. Nobody needs to discuss finances.

Open · 10	Read · 10	Discuss · 45	Practice · 15	Close · 10
Optional October observation	Selected passages aloud	The questions below	Define enough in one area	One takeaway each

DISCUSSION QUESTIONS

1. In one area of life, what would enough provide? What keeps moving the threshold?
2. At the banquet, what changes when you receive your share without treating the table as yours?
3. How could simplifying one convenience reveal whether you depend on it?
4. What gladness comes from sound judgment or goodwill rather than getting another external reward?
5. How can you appreciate ordinary advantages without making them conditions of living well?

PRACTICE THIS MONTH

Name enough. Choose one recurring want and state what would reasonably serve its purpose. When the threshold expands, examine what "more" promises; simplifying one small area can test the dependence. Notice what remains worth welcoming; no cheerful mood is required.

FACILITATOR'S MOVE

"Enough for what purpose?" Needs differ with circumstances and responsibilities. Examine the reason for the threshold rather than ranking people by how little they own.

NOTES